On the first day of July, forty-eight girls and twelve counselors ran through the rain from the shelter of their tents toward the wide wooden steps that led down the hill to Point House. Some of them wore the ponchos that the catalogue had recommended, but more of them braved the wet in their navy blue shorts and the white T-shirts that said ALLEGRO in green letters across the front.

The curtain of rain nearly hid the lake that lapped around the foundations of Point House. The building, which had originally been a dance hall before the first Camp Allegro appropriated it, was a low, gray-shingled building built on a point of land. Its wide porch hung out over the lake, and on a clear day Loon Island was visible, about three quarters of a mile ahead, and far beyond that at the end of the lake, the hazy outline of the village. On the shore to the right of them was the tree under which the poet e.e. cummings had spent summers when Stella's mother was a camper. She claimed to have seen him once.

some sheets hastily dispatched to her by her mother for the occasion. It had a pennant flying from the stern, a white flag with a red crusaders' cross. Nicole had done a good job, and her canoe brought applause from the crowd.

Kim's also brought a gasp of appreciation. She had fashioned a Mexican butterfly boat, and the result was charming. It dipped slightly in the breeze hovering butterfly.

The line of slowly moving canoes passed the dock as far as the next point of land, turned and started back. Judges were scribbling furiously.

Eventually the canoes came in close, turned around. One of Kelly Hastings's Japanese lanterns came loose and fell into the water with a hiss. There was an "ohh" of sympathy from the crowd.

When the canoes had passed the dock again, Mr. Goldy picked up the megaphone and called out the names of the three top contenders. His voice boomed across the water. "Sheila Jackson, clipper ship." He paused. "Nicole Nasby, Venetian barque." Another pause. Stella held her breath. "Kim Wilson, butterfly boat." Stella breathed again. "Will you three please come past the dock again? The rest of you return to the Point House, circle around, come back and beach your canoes. You are all splendid. Thank you very much."

The three contenders broke out of the line and formed a line of their own. Nicole leading, then Kim,

When her mother sends her to Camp Allegro, Stella prepares herself for the worst. But it isn't half bad. There's tennis, horseback riding, basketball, and crafts. There's even the camp song:

We're Allegro born, we're Allegro bred,
And when we die, we're Allegro dead . . .

But then some unusual and mysterious things start happening. A frightened Stella wonders if the camp song might not just come true.
